The Renshaw family is one of equal prominence. After a wedding journey, the bride and bridegroom will live near Easton, Md.

Mr. Renshaw is widely known in Virginia and has great many relatives and friends living in Richmond. Invitations Out.

Bible Found in Corner-Stone.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.] Bristol, Va., November 21.—The cornerstone of the original central building at Emory and Henry College was opened this week, as the last layers of brick in the old walls were removed, preparatory to the erection of a modern building to cost $100,000.

The cornerstone, which bears the name of the Abingdon Lodge, and the names of the men composing the building committee, was laid September 30, 1836, one year after the organization of the school by the Holston conference. There were at that time two persons living in the community of Emory now who were alive when this cornerstone was laid. They are the wife of Professor James Davis, who was eight years old at that time, and A. H. Nye, who was two years old.

A leather-bound Bible, with gold hump, and three silver coins were taken from the stone.

WHISKEY TRADE LOOKING UP.

Wet Bristol to Flood Dry Tennessee During Holidays.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.] Bristol, Va., November 21.—In view of the fact that all the distilleries in Tennessee have been closed, the Bristol Va. whiskey shippers are anticipating a much larger Christmas trade from that State, and advertising matter is now being distributed with that view.

It is calculated that the phrase "for personal use only," now required to be stamped on every package for shipment, will be much overworked during the next five or six weeks.

QUESTIONS OWN RIGHT TO TITLE HE BEARS

Lord Durham Probably Only Peer Who Has Expressed Such Misgiving.

BY LA MARQUESE DE FONTENAY.

LORD DURHAM, with whom King George and Queen Mary are to spend the coming week at Lambton Castle, in the County of Durham, is probably the only peer, and assuredly the only Knight of the Order of the Garter, who has publicly questioned his own right to the title which he bears.

In a speech, delivered some time ago at a public dinner in London, he explained to his fellow guests that he was one of twin brothers, and that in his early infancy there was such a striking resemblance between himself and his brother that the nurses had put different colored ribbons around their arms to distinguish them. He added that he had always been in doubt as to whether he did not owe the earldom of Durham, his seat in the House of Lords, and the possession of the family estates, which yield him an income of some $500,000 a year, to the fond partiality of a monthly nurse.

Lord Durham, however, is childless and separated from his wife, so at his death his honors and property will pass to his twin brother, Colonel the Hon. Fred Lambton, and any mistake or fraud of which the nurse may have rendered herself guilty will thus be straightened out and repaired.

Lambton Castle is situated on a height, overlooking the River Wear. Half Gothic, half Tudor, it almost disappeared about sixty years ago, beneath the surface of the ground; and then the fact was brought to light that the Lambtons of the reign of Queen Elizabeth and of King James, in their greed for extracting the coal from their mines at the least possible cost, had wholly neglected to make any provision for the support of the seams which had been worked beneath the castle. A very large sum had to be spent in securing the ancient foundation of the castle by means of extensive brickwork.

Any mention of the latter would be incomplete without a brief reference to the Lambton dragon, and, as it has a bearing upon the crime of fishing on Sunday, in the neighborhood of the more youthful readers of these letters. It seems that one of the Lambtons, who lived in the twelfth century, and who boasted of being so brave that he feared neither God nor man, went fishing in the River Wear, one day, among other things, a small eel, or salamander, and on his way back to the castle threw it into a well (which is still shown to this day) and thought no more about it. Some time afterwards he went out to the Crusades, and remained absent in the Holy Land for a number of years, fighting the Saracens.

Meanwhile, the salamander had thriven in the well, and had grown to such Brobdingnagian proportions that its quarters became too cramped, and it emerged therefrom, making its way to the river. It became the terror of the countryside, and, in default of the daily contribution of the milk of nine cows, it devoured man and beast.

At this juncture, the Crusader Lambton returned from the Holy Land, and, horrified at the result of his piscatorial exploit, undertook to slay the monster, which his infraction of the laws of the Sabbath had inflicted upon the people of Durhamshire. After several terrible but unsuccessful encounters, Lambton, in accordance with the customs of those days, went to consult a local seer. On her advice, he arrayed himself in a coat of armor studded with knife blades, and awaited the dragon's onslaught. Accordingly, the monster, on winding itself furiously around the knight, was cut to pieces by its own efforts.

The sibilant had only promised Lambton's success on the condition that he would slay the first living thing which met his sight after his victory over the dragon. To avoid the possibility of human sacrifice, Lambton instructed his father, immediately on hearing three blasts of his horn, to release some household animals. But the old knight was so overjoyed at the death of the dragon, that he forgot his instructions, and ran out to meet his son himself. The crusader preferred obeying the sibilant to becoming a paragon, and, after his victory, he obeyed the dragon, by way of punishment, that for nine generations no chief of the Lambtons should die in his bed, a punishment which, as Surtees, the well-known historian of the County of Durham, truly remarks, could not have seemed very terrible to a martial spirit.

Oddly enough, for several generations, no chief of the family did die in his bed, and it is related that the knight, in order to break the spell, kept pistols on his pillow throughout his last illness, to prevent his servants from removing him. The crusader and his peculiar knife-studded armor are somewhat mutilated effigy on the wall at Lambton, little, however, remaining of the stone knives.

It is wholly without precedent for the Queen to accept the hospitality of a peer who is separated from his wife, and, especially to honor him with a week's stay beneath his roof. There are, however, mitigating circumstances in the case of Lord Durham, whose unmarried sister, Lady Anne Lambton, will help him to do the honors to the sovereign and his consort, Lord Durham married, more than thirty years ago, the lovely Ethel Sulner, sister of Mary, Lady Gerard. It was only afterwards that he ascertained that she had been practically forced into the alliance by her relatives; that she had given her heart to a penniless suitor, and that she had been a prey to such fits of melancholia prior to the wedding, as to suggest an unbalanced mind. After her marriage this condition of mind became more pronounced, and, before the year was out, culminated in an extraordinary scene at Hampden House, at a ball given by the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn, in London, where, after wandering about with agonized eyes, Ophelia-like, among the gay crowds, she suddenly commenced to calmly disrobe herself in the crowded ballroom. It became necessary to place her under restraint.

Lord Lambton, on learning all the facts of the case, brought a suit in the divorce court, asking for a dissolution of the union, on the ground that he had assigned her been kept in ignorance of his wife's mental condition prior to the marriage, and that under the circumstances, she ought not to have been permitted to wed. Although he was able to bring evidence to the effect that she had been treated for melancholia before the marriage, yet, according to English law, he was unable to secure any relief from the courts, and has thus been obliged to go through life wedded, yet without a wife, who is still under restraint.

Lord Durham is a man of very strong convictions, in this sense, that when the political party to which he belongs adopts a policy of which he does not approve, he at once proceeds to abandon it, and to join the opposition. He started out as a Liberal, then seceded, and was one of the organizers of the Unionist wing of the Tory party; while a few years ago, disapproving, in his capacity of a great mine owner, of the employers' liability act, he renounced the Unionists and Conservatives, and returned to the Liberals. Possessed, as he is, of vast estates, and of great mining industries, with many thousands of people in his employ, whose families are virtually dependent upon his good will, he commands an immense amount of political influence. It is by no means improbable that the new burdens which the present government is about to place upon the shoulders of the great landowners, will cause him once more to change his political colors, and to abandon the Liberals for the Unionists.

While very warm-hearted and generous, Lord Durham is very aggressive and irritable, not to say cranky, and probably inherits these peculiarities from his grandfather, the first earl, who enjoyed the reputation of being the most quarrelsome man in the House of Commons. On this account, he was shipped off to Canada, as its first Governor-General, and when he declined to remain there any longer and started home, he was created in his stead a peer of the realm prior to his arrival. In order to break at all costs, his re-entering the House of Commons, and making life impossible there for the government of the day. As much as the present Lord Durham has, ever since his schoolboy days, been renowned as the better tempered of the twins, it may readily be imagined that when Freddie Lambton comes into the family honors and inherits the titles and estates, he will worthily maintain the traditions of his family, and of his ancestors.
